Public Health Field Study in Cambodia

Cambodia is one of the poorest nations in Southeast Asia with high rates of morbidity and mortality and a history of genocide. Though great strides have been made towards improving the nation's health and infrastructure, important work remains to be done to address disparities and persistent health issues ranging from undernutrition to clean water to HIV. Students will work with the Reproductive and Child Health Alliance (RACHA), a Cambodian non-governmental organization in the capital city Phnom Penh.
RACHA implements local health projects related to water and sanitation, health care quality improvement, maternal, child and reproductive health, or other topics depending on the student's interests and the priorities of the organization. Students should expect to spend $1,700.00 on air travel, $500.00 per month on lodging and between $5-$20.00/day on food and local transportation, depending on personal preferences and location.
